Despite the commitment of many staff, I have always held that parents are, and always will be, the prime educators of their children. As such, there must always be channels open for the parents to express their views and influence the development of the school. Furthermore, the school has a responsibility to parents to keep them informed on general issues and on the progress of their child.

Although many areas obviously require the special expertise and training of our teachers, it is well documented that involving parents in their children's formal education improves their children's achievement. We are keen to offer parents a greater opportunity to become involved in the future. This will be most effective when it is comprehensive, well planned and long lasting.
